Exemplums are stories told in order to make as moral point. Like gossip, exemplums fulfil the function of prescribing what is considered to be acceptable behaviour in the cultural context in which they are told. The difference in text structure between exemplums and other narrative texts is that the narrative stage serves as exemplary evidence for the moral that the speaker draws: the events are not necessarily problematized (as in narratives) or remarkable (as in anecdotes), but they are told in order to illustrate the speakers' judgement of what _____. The generic structure of an exemplum, then, includes the optional elements (abstract) followed by (orientation) and then the obligatory sequence incident interpretation, after which an optional coda leads the way for the story to finish and for the conversation to return to chat.

It is important that students understand what interpreting art really means; there is a difference between interpretation and copying another's work. In order to interpret a piece of artwork, the original source has to be transformed into a new individual expression. This can be accomplished in terms of design or idea. Works that are interpretations of another must give credit to the source being interpreted; otherwise, the effort could be considered plagiarism, which is illegal, considered stealing, and can result in heavy lawsuits. It is important that beginners understand that copying a work closely for studying purposes is beneficial; however, if the source is not mentioned, it is illegal and offensive. Remember, an interpretation of a piece of artwork has to _____.

- ① institute legal proceedings of copying artwork
- ② be reflected a high level of expertise about art skills
- ③ demonstrate a new perspective in terms of design or concept
- ④ promote freedom of individuals' expression about interpreting art
- ⑤ be left on ambiguity boundary between plagiarism and interpretation

At the same time, it is also evident that the issues related to both product and service innovation will require the adoption of a more interdisciplinary mode of inquiry and call for contributions from most business functional areas.

Innovation has assumed considerable importance in the contemporary business worlds. In most industries, the very survival of firms is increasingly dependent on their ability to rapidly develop and introduce innovative products and services. (①) On average, more than one-third of a corporation's revenue comes from products and services that did not exist 5 years ago. (②) That figure is much higher in certain technology industries. (③) The nature and the process of innovation have also undergone significant change in the past several years as more and more firms open up their organizational boundaries to seek out innovative ideas and expertise from a wide range of external entities. (④) Indeed, the field of product development(PD) has been defined as including the set of activities "beginning with the perception of a market opportunity and ending in the production, sales, and delivery of a product". (⑤) Compared to other management areas as marketing, operations, and strategy, the field of information technology(IT) has been a relatively late entrant in the domain of product and service innovation.

Jelalian and Mehlenbeck added weekly peer-based skills training to a cognitive-behavioral weight management intervention that targeted diet, physical activity, and behavior modification in overweight adolescents. The peer-based skills were developed through outward bound-type activities designed to enhance trust, social skills, and self-confidence. Significant changes in physical self-worth were obtained, but not in perceptions of peer rejection or loneliness. Case illustrations suggested that despite the peer rejection and loneliness findings, participants did become more outgoing and assertive with peers. This could influence the effectiveness of youth in obtaining peer support for their lifestyle changes. Clearly more work is needed in the area of peer-based interventions to replicate existing findings, broaden the range of strategies employed, broaden the range of peer constructs used in evaluation of understanding youth physical activity. In particular, research targeting friends as potential sources of influence on youth physical activity levels and sedentary behavior would become more thorough.
